Small public and private water supplies are often remotely situated, unmanned and have very limited services. Consequently, the design and implementation of cost effective monitoring of these supplies to meet increasing demands for data on operational performance and water quality can pose problems. A multiplicity of radio communication techniques is available to simplify and reduce the cost of this data collection. Presentations will be given by leading experts on legal and operational requirements, remote sensing, data capture and transmission. This Workshop will provide a valuable opportunity to examine the problems and potential solutions.
