The introduction of the EU Water Framework Directive sets standards for drinking water which must be wholesome and clean with an obligation of Member States to regularly monitor the quality of their drinking water. The revised Directive released in 2003 and the World Health Organisation in 2004 stated that drinking water should be safe in terms of microbiological and chemical contamination (also includes radiological contamination). Further EU reports released in 2007, 2008 and 2009 reinforce surveillance as an important aspect of the directive and this workshop seeks to explore the role of new technologies in detecting microbiological hazards or chemical toxins. A number of specific technology developments will be presented and the meeting will be challenged on how to respond to the increasing amount of information generated by these technologies.
